This chapter explores political decision-making relating to infrastructure investments in light of the recent trends towards establishing independent expert bodies to guide this process. The chapter argues that the complexity of infrastructure governance leads to patterns of decision-making shaped by mechanisms of bounded rationality and selective perception.

Public procurement accounts for a significant portion of countries' GDP and offers large potential for savings in times of austerity. To improve the effectiveness of their infrastructure investments many countries have taken various steps to modernise public procurement processes. However, due to the huge range of available options, governments are increasingly faced with the challenge to ...
